

To whom it may concern:

I cannot recommend Amy Hillis as a speaker/musical performer highly enough. I have walked with Amy as a fellow sojourner, creative writer, homeschool mom, and dear friend, and I have witnessed firsthand the integrity she exhibits in every area of her life. Perhaps most significantly, I have watched her lead her family through hardship and suffering with a grace and a tenacious faith that have deeply encouraged my own walk with Christ.

As a speaker and an artist, Amy is a true wordsmith who possesses the rare combination of total vulnerability and theological accuracy. She does not shy away from the uncomfortable topics of brokenness and pain, whether they are the result of our own choices or simply of a fallen world; rather, she leans into the hard truths of the Gospel and graciously shares with her listeners the lessons she has fought tooth and nail to learn. Throw in the raw and unassuming power of her music, and I can think of few speakers who have moved my heart to the extent that Amy has. I know her testimony well, yet when I heard it as an audience member for the first time, I sobbed quietly in my seat, shocked by the force with which it ministered to my own hurting soul.

In short, Amy is a deep well. I can think of no one more gifted or qualified to lead a room full of hurting people to the very feet of Jesus, and I rejoice when I think of the hearts that will turn to Him as a result of her ministry.
